

It seemed like an ordinary day...

Two brothers, Jack and Luke, were going to school. It was something normal for the brothers to be bullied every single day in school because of their different skin color, as they were black! They wouldn't tell anyone this because they were too afraid, embarrassed and alone... It seemed like the whole school was against them.

One day, a teacher witnessed the bullying these brothers were facing, and he decided to address it to the headmaster. The headmaster's only thought about the situation was that it was just kids playing, so he did nothing. The bullying situation continued for days and days, until that marvelous day when everything changed.

That day, a black girl, with a comforting smile on her face, approached a group of people from the School Council. She came to the school and told the students what bullying actually meant and how their actions can hurt. The girl offered the brothers an invitation to the next support group meeting for minorities. Fortunately, the group leader and founder knew exactly what the boys were going through. She spoke with so much raw emotion in her voice about the pain bullying brings to minorities, that many of the students felt bad for not trying to prevent it. All the students understood what their actions actually meant and how they affected others.

From that day on, they began to be more understanding and empathetic towards black people. The brothers never faced any bullying again.
